Cookies

Cookies are small text files collected by the server of our website that allow us to know if your computer or device has visited the site before. They also store information about the type of browser you have, the operating system being used, language preferences and a number of other pieces of information. Cookies do not search your computer for information; they only register the information you provide through your browser.

We use cookies in order to improve our site. Cookies enable us to see how visitors move around our site and also to count the number of visitors and repeat visitors. We are interested in knowing what links you follow and how long you spend on pages. By collecting this information we can determine whether you are finding the information you are looking for easily or whether we need to change the way our site works.

You can block cookies through your browser settings that will allow you to refuse all or some cookies. If you block all cookies, however, you may not be able to access all or parts of our site.

Unenforceable Provisions. Any unenforceable provision of this policy will not affect the enforceability of other provisions of this policy.
